A Brief History of Modern-Day Rufino mazat, The most remarkable example of the ancient Persian poet's poetry comes from the days of the Mongols, and as such, should serve as a very good introduction to the ancient Iranian world. By way of background, one could argue that the Persian empire took its name from the Persian word for "the great river". From that moment on, the Persian language became known as Urab, after the river at the center of Persian geography. As soon as the Mongols conquered Persia and set up their own city states there, the city of Rufino and others around it were subjection and subject to the imperial rule of the Khans. This was by no means the only case of this, but it is likely that among other factors, the Khans found that the city and village (the 'titan' at Rufino became very important in terms of trade through trade with Asian merchants and merchants in Asian provinces who often worked at the same port which they themselves controlled. Thus, the Mongol influence on the Rufino mazat is perhaps what led to this style of verse rather than the more common Persian poetics. As such, any reader who has previously been familiar with some of the Persian poetical works (e.g. the Persian poetry of Muhamed Nasr, the Persian poetry of Asma Jafar) would also notice that, while there is much that should be familiar (the use of images, etc.), there are many that could easily be improved by having the reader read through the whole of the Persian verse. To that end, the following examples provide a brief history of Rufino mazat as written and presented by Persian scholar Rufino P. Moya. With respect to the Persian poetography of this subject matter, we must first remember that Rufino was born in 1750 in the coastal town of Ruma. To date, his life has been primarily concerned with Persian studies, or as he calls them 'theoretical Persian' studies under Khojov (who, according to one biography, was a doctor of medicine during his own lifetime). His early works have seen some major revisions, and a selection of them include works like the first two volumes of the Persian poetic poems of Khojov and Abydos-i Kho. The first volume, known as Rufino khan-ul-Maghazi, is primarily devoted to the poets' works, but it, (1 pb PDF)..
