Electrochemical cells and their application to power generation are well known, various types of cells being useful for a large variety of purposes. In one general class of electrochemical cell, alkali metal halide-containing compositions are used in a primary cell. Such cells operate by producing a chemical reaction between the alkali metal halide and an oxidant whereby the latter is converted to a relatively high potential. During use of such cells, the alkali metal halide can react with one another and with the end product, corroding the cell. For this reason such cells are required to have good corrosion resistance. One general class of such cells that is not seriously affected by corrosion in the cell is primary cells containing the chemical fuels Li, Na, K, and Cs. These fuels, as well as other alkali metal halides, have considerable vapor pressure at room temperature, and can carry current at or near their boiling point under ordinary conditions. The alkali metal halides of such cells, however, tend to form other substances with the oxidant, particularly at anodes containing carbon, thereby rendering such cells less conductive than might be desired. The alkali metal halides are formed by electrochemical oxidation of the corresponding metal in a primary cell. Primary cell anodes generally contain a mixture of an active metal and a current carrier material, such as carbon. In a nonreactive cell, the active material is not consumed in the course of reaction. However, in a reactive cell, the active material is consumed, the reactant consuming the metal of the active material. In the process of electrochemical oxidation, the active material of the carbon becomes exhausted. Electrochemical oxidation of alkali metal halides is sometimes accompanied by the undesirable consumption of the carbon of the anode. This may be due to the following. As the alkali metal halide is electrochemically oxidized, the active material of the carbon within the cell is consumed and the cell must be charged to replace this active material. Often, the alkali metal halide is converted to a substance that reacts with the carbon and the rate of consumption of the active material is dependent on the extent of alkali metal halide conversion to this substance. Thus, in cells containing substantial amounts of alkali metal halide, the carbon is undesirably consumed as the cell is charged, and in cells with a high degree of conversion of the alkali metal halide to the undesirable substance, the carbon is also consumed at a high rate. Unfortunately,

Q: What does AddRemoveAppliance: UpdateDevice: succeed and other I'm trying to update my device code, and I have it working most of the way. In the LogFile, it shows that it succeeds Microsoft.DataTransfer.WpfDeviceUpdater.AddRemoveApplianceUpdatedDevice Succeeded. Device added DeviceId: 00023772933A. But in the LogFile, it shows some more failures, and to be honest I dont understand why. Microsoft.DataTransfer.WpfDeviceUpdater.PrepareForUpdate: PreparingForUpdate failed. Details: Timeout expired. The timeout period elapsed prior to completion of the operation or the server is not responding. I'm guessing it is failing, because it needs my permission, so it goes to AsyncSetupDevice(). It also shows the following: Error SCM_E_E_APP_VERSION_MISMATCH It's referring to a deviceVersion, in this case 000005728F116414. I can understand that it is failing as the deviceVersion I am referring to should be different to the next version in my device list, but it is not. But now I'm not sure how to remove the device from the device list. At the moment I'm doing as follows: public void AsyncUpdateDevice(AppUpdateDeviceRequest data) { var deviceUpdateService = new WpfDeviceUpdaterService(); var device = await deviceUpdateService.UpdateDeviceAsync(data.Id, data.InstallLocation, data.UpdateGUID, data.Version, new System.Threading.CancellationTokenSource(), null); DeviceManager.Instance.RemoveDevice(device.Id); UpdateDevicesUI(); } You can see that I'm calling the RemoveDevice method. But if it is a bad idea to call that in a async method, how can I get rid of the device in DeviceManager.Instance? A: I solved it. Simply use an async void on the async method, and remove the device from the DeviceManager there. public async void

AsyncUpdateDevice(AppUpdateDeviceRequest data) { var deviceUpdate
